WEATHER SYNOPSIS BY REGION

NORTHERN CALIFORNIA

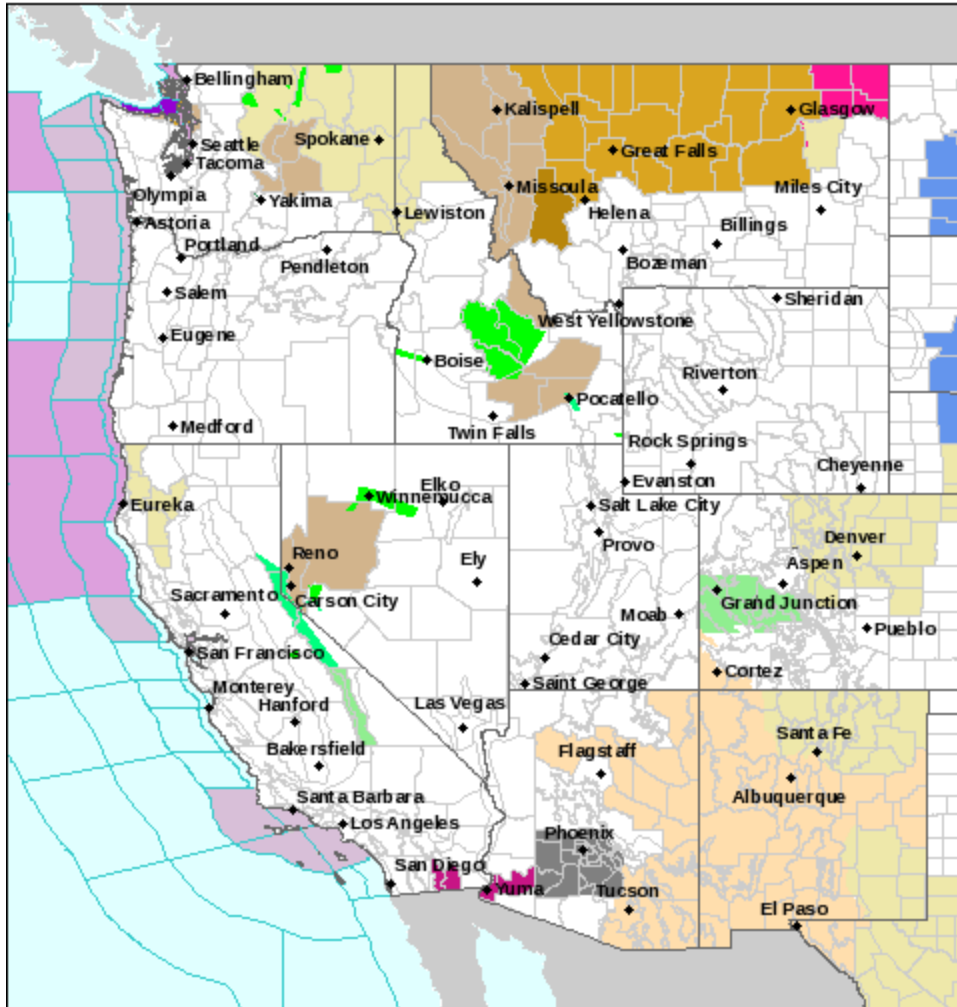

Another day of high pressure over Northern California today will produce afternoon highs of 100-105 in the warmest inland areas with plenty of other lower elevation inland areas in the mid and upper 90s. Afternoon minimum relative humidity (RH) will also be reasonably low today in those areas with the lowest values 10-18%. The high will weaken a little today, and some cumulus buildups may occur south of Tahoe, but thunderstorms are unlikely. Wednesday a trough moving through the Pacific Northwest will open the door for a few afternoon cumulus buildups over the northern and eastern mountains with a very small chance of a few late afternoon and evening thunderstorms. More isolated late afternoon and evening mountain thunderstorms may become possible Thursday through Monday, but right now, confidence of that happening is low and probably won't occur Thursday. Some isolated mountain showers seem more likely than thunderstorms through that period. The coolest day this week is likely to be Friday when the warmest inland areas drop into the upper 80s. Higher pressure returns for the Memorial Day holiday weekend with a warming trend that will put the warmest inland areas well back into the 90s by Monday. Some gusty west winds will develop through the Delta Wednesday afternoon with gusty southerly winds developing through the Sacramento Valley and surrounding foothills. There will also be some northerly winds picking up our northern-most counties Wednesday. Areas of lighter, but still gusty afternoon south to westerly winds will be in place Thursday through the holiday weekend. A trough will be approaching the coast early next week for a cool down and possibly a bit more light mountain precipitation.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA

A strong ridge off the coast will produce very warm temperatures across the inland valleys and foothills again today. Highs will range from the 70s at the coast to the upper 90s to around 100 in the valleys and foothills. Minimum RH will drop into the 10-15% over most elevations below 8,000 feet for 4-6 hours this afternoon. A deep trough over the Pacific Northwest will sweep inland toward the northern Rockies Wednesday through the end of the week, leading to much cooler weather over most areas. Expect temperatures to drop 3-5 degrees Wednesday, and by Thursday, widespread marine layer stratus can be expected during the night and morning hours. High temperatures will only be in the 70s to lower 80s in the valleys with much higher afternoon RH. Isolated wet thunderstorms can be expected in the Sierras Wednesday and Thursday, but the storms will be very short lived and confined to areas near the crest. Increasing onshore flow may produce west winds of 20-30 mph with gusts to 50 mph in the Kern County Mountains, Antelope Valley and Banning Pass Thursday and Friday. Another ridge is expected to build over the area this weekend, which will allow temperatures to reach the 90s inland once again by Sunday.
